

I've only been a Nominet member since this year, however have been active on the Internet since the late 80's.

I can see no reason for spending members money on a research project, surely there's been so much research & education already. Aren't the majority of users at risk due to their choice of OS rather than simply uneducated?

Could you not use the funds to provide EPP clients to members, better end user & registrant domain management tools and such like? Even if not a full client, why not provide Nominet client libraries in the major programming languages.

Additionally, why not raise the limits on the whois and DAC systems, if there's a huge pot of cash sitting about, then this could easily be channelled into better performing hardware to run these systems on.

Any reason why you couldn't give a free year for every X years of membership, this would keep the funds with the members, but remove the need to modify domain pricing?

Just a few suggestions

Alex Monaghan
Monaghan Consultants Ltd.